MiniTool Partition Wizard Home Edition 7.6 Free Multilingual. mini tool partition wizard 7.6 crack Mapping the NK cell receptor repertoire using monoclonal antibodies. Natural killer (NK) cells are a component of the innate immune system that kills tumor cells, virally infected cells, and other "foreign" cells. They detect cells that have been damaged by pathogens and that express class I major histocompatibility complex (MHC) molecules. They recognize viral, bacterial, and tumor cells through the use of activating and inhibitory cell surface receptors that bind to MHC class I molecules. NK cells have two main functions: recognizing and destroying targets that have been "marked" for destruction by pathogens, and providing help to stimulate humoral and cellular responses against targets that express MHC class I molecules. Although NK cells are primarily cytotoxic cells, they may also be involved in antibody production and in cytotoxicity after infection and stress. Most NK cells, however, are CD56(bright) cells that have a mature, effector function. An understanding of the NK cell receptor repertoire is essential to understanding NK cell biology, both in health and in diseases. Mature NK cells are governed by inhibitory and activating NK receptors. Multiple inhibitory receptors bind to MHC class I molecules, and this interaction inactivates a NK cell. In contrast, multiple activating NK receptors have been identified that bind to specific ligands on MHC class I molecules. Most activating NK cell receptors recognize "stress" ligands that are upregulated on pathogen-infected or transformed cells. Recent data have also identified a "missing" receptor, called Ly49D, that is important for antiviral host defense. This review will discuss the development and function of NK cells, including the NK cell receptor repertoire, and applications of NK cell therapies.
