Investigation of conduction properties of electrode body loop electrodes and comprehensive multicore multipoint electrode systems for human electroencephalogram based on a thick tissue, synthetic tissue, and thick-walled ferrite sphere model. This study presents an investigation of the conduction properties of electrode body loop (EBL) electrodes and the comprehensive multipoint electrode systems (MES) in comparison with a three-dimensional (3D) model based on the computer-aided design (CAD) of the electrode array and a real brain case. The tissue model includes the white matter (WM) and gray matter (GM) with two different cortical thicknesses, namely, 3 and 6 mm. The simulation results show that the fastest conduction direction of EBL electrodes in the WM is along the axis of the cylindrical body. In the GM, there are two fast directions of conduction, one along the axis of the cylinder and the other is perpendicular to the axis. The fastest conduction of EBL electrodes in the GM is found in a direction perpendicular to the cylinder axis. This result is consistent with the findings of published reports. The fastest conduction in the WM is related to the fiber distribution. A complete MES with two channels has a satisfactory response in the GM with six electrodes. The results also indicate that a perfect MES does not always provide the best response. It is possible to identify the most effective channels of the MES in the critical regions of the brain. Sen. Martha McSally (R-AZ) said she opposed President Donald Trump's recent efforts to end the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program in the face of "millions of Americans voicing their support for DACA." "For nearly ten years, this Administration has been unlawfully undermining our nation's immigration laws and working families. It's time we stop the ba244e880a
