The fourth part is on the regulation in relation to photography. The last part will conclude the chapter by giving an overall conclusion. All these photocopies are reproductions. But even the original is a product of reproduction because the first photocopying copy is only a copy. In any case, photocopies are highly reproducible copies of the original documents. Three methods of reproduction are used. The first one is reproducing the original by transferring it to a glass plate. The second one is scanning the original and then reproducing it. The third one is making a photocopy on paper. In any case, even if the original is reproduced in the first two ways, it is only a reproduction. Then, we will explain the characteristics of the three types of reproduction. The first way of reproduction, reproducing the original by transferring it to a glass plate. The second way of reproduction, scanning the original and then reproducing it, is the reproduction of the original document. This original copy is called the first reproduction. However, the photocopy is only a reproduction copy, because it is not the original. Therefore, if we describe the original and the first reproduction, we are not describing the copy. It is only a reproduction of
