The management of various types of cancer has been one of the most important problems in the recent medical and pharmaceutical fields. Especially, cancer stem cells, which are stem cells having self-renewal and multilineage differentiation potential, may be involved in the cancerogenesis, recurrence, and drug resistance of cancer. Therefore, the development of a method for the investigation and treatment of cancer by targeting the cancer stem cells has been demanded. In fact, it has been reported that there is a population of cancer stem cells that is responsible for the cancerogenesis and metastasis of cancer. On the other hand, as a new class of anticancer agents, curcuminoids, which are the main bioactive components of Curcuma longa, have been shown to have a strong anticancer effect on various cancer cells, including human breast cancer cells, colon cancer cells, prostate cancer cells, and pancreatic cancer cells.
